SOMETHING OLD, Something New

Lowcountry golf gets better and better

When you consider that Slovakia introduced its country's first golf course last year, courtesy of local company International Golf Course Design, it seems almost unfair that we, in the Lowcountry, could be blessed with not only an abundance of courses within a short driving distance, but also some of the most well-designed, envied and enjoyed facilities anywhere in the world.

It's been thirty five years since Hilton Head truly landed on the "top golf destinations" map with the opening of Harbour Town Golf Links and our community's repertoire of quality courses just keeps growing.

Between our twelve-by-five-mile island, Bluffton, Okatie and Beaufort, our region boasts more than 30 courses, private and public, that offer golf enthusiasts a diverse menu of play from traditional parkland-style courses to those with spectacular Lowcountry vistas and challenging links-style layouts, to just about everything in between.

Better than Botox

In an effort to maintain world-class quality, be competitive with other golf destinations and even address the wear and tear of increased golfer
